NEWS FROM THE SUBURBS.

"Moral weakness and suicide," was the title of a lecture delivered yesterday afternoon to a crowded congregation in the Church of the Passionist Monastery, West Hoboken, by Monsignor Capel. In Saxony, he said, the number of suicides in twelve months were 1,081 men and 923 women; and in England 1,445 men and 519 women, and in the United States of America, the average number of suicides was 1,090. In the last six months he numbered 536. He did not think any more appalling statement than this could be made in a Church of God. Proceeding to analyze these figures, the lecturer said out of 260 cases of suicide in the last three months in the United States, 72 were attributed to idleness, or what he called "laziness." He spoke of insanity: 33 to bad family training; 44 to physical sickness; 33 to business trouble; 20 to irregular affection and 28 to a life of dissipation. In other words, the 72 attributable to insanity constituted but one-tenth of the total number. He pointed out the frequency with which juries returned verdicts of temporary insanity, and said of 600 cases it was a charitable view for the judge to take, but he considered it tended to mislead the public. The cause of suicide he attributed to three things: First, the love of America, which he characterized as peculiar to the young; second, the over-eating of the young; third, the love of the Almighty, by whom they would receive moral strength to withstand temptation.
